This is ultimately a book with a highly questionable thesis that suffers from the same narrow military myopia that afflicted it's subject matter i.e. the Prussian/German General Staff 1807-1945. Dupuy argues that the US, and other nations should adopt the principals and doctrine of the German General Staff in our own military if we want to perform at the same level of military excellence that the Germany army supposedly demonstrated in the wars between 1807-1945.

Dupuy, an authority on WW II, denies that the German Army went into a decline in the mid-1800s; on the contrary, the great victories climaxing in the Franco-Prussian War were being prepared by the general staff. The brilliance of German performance in both world wars is stressed—convincingly enough for WW I, less so for WW II. Nor does Dupuy give a Clausewitzian political context to his ...
