It seems, then, that the data on deterrence neither strengthen nor weaken the case for capital punishment. Retribution . We saw earlier that, although human punishment does not bear the full burden of requiring good and evil, it must hold up requital as an ideal; it must point beyond itself, to that perfect justice of which it is merely a token. Cardinal Dulles agrees, but he sees a problem ...

Capital punishment denies due process of law. Its imposition is often arbitrary, and always irrevocable – forever depriving an individual of the opportunity to benefit from new evidence or new laws that might warrant the reversal of a conviction, or the setting aside of a death sentence. The death penalty violates the constitutional guarantee of equal protection. It is applied randomly ...

This does not seem to be the case as regards capital punishment for several reasons8: 24. If the death penalty is seen as contrary to the right of life or the protection from cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment, these are basic human rights that can never be derogated from - not in peacetime and not in wartime. 25. Some people argue that the death penalty holds a unique deterrent effect in ...

Throughout the course of human history criminals have been made to pay for their crimes in one form or another. Countless souls have been lost at the hands of criminals, who in turn lost their lives after judgment was rendered upon them by their peers. The rallying cry behind many executions is to assuage a sense of wrongdoing and provide justice to those who were harmed.

When James Madison proposed the Eighth Amendment prohibiting "cruel and unusual punishment," it could not have certainly been interpreted as banning the death penalty by the standards of its time—the death penalty was cruel, but certainly not unusual. But as more and more countries ban capital punishment, the definition of "cruel and unusual" continues to change.
