The Half Life of Molly Pierce is an interesting novel. It centers around Molly who had the perfect loving family, great friends, and a top student ranking. But Molly had DID (Dissociative Identity Disorder) and she didn't know it. Molly suddenly suffers from depression and tries to commit suicide; however, Mabel (her alter) intervenes. Mabel tries to make Molly better --- whole by trying to live a happy life that may fill the void of sadness Molly has.

In Half-Life, Ms. Leno masterfully unfolds her plot through Molly's limited view-point weaving her way through a complicated mental illness and holding her readers hostage in her can't-put-it-down YA mystery. Leno chose what I've found to be an all-too-rarely-used staccato style of writing that lends itself well to both the choppy reality of Molly's life and the urgency of what we find Molly ...

The Half Life Of Molly Pierce by Katrina Leno is a debut novel that TOTALLY IS REALLY SHORT. Like, my ARC was only 231 pages which means it's one of those blink and you're done type of books. I am really okay with this. This young adult book is all about this girl named Molly Pierce who often blanks out and finds herself with wide swaths of her memory missing. Note: This is not at all a ...

The Half Life of Molly Pierce is a suspenseful, evocative psychological mystery about uncovering the secrets of our pasts, facing the unknowns of our futures, and accepting our whole selves. The Half Life of Molly Pierce is a book that very much depends on readers piecing together the story surrounding Molly's blackouts at the same time that Molly, herself, does.
